

THIS and THAT practice

This is the story of what happened that day. She said she hit that, but this doesn't add up. I mean, if she hit that, wouldn't this be the result? After all, this is what happens when you do that. But she said that it did happen, and her husband didn't dispute this. When she said this, a lawsuit was filed. In that lawsuit, the papers alleged this: that she hit this; that she wasn't hurt; that it was his fault. When she filed that, this attorney called her. He wanted the facts of this case. That wasn't hard, as this just happened a few months ago. She was able to tell him all about this case. They were able to settle this case and that was a relief. She didn't want this case to go to court. She felt that this was the best option for her. That was all she had to say about this. She was asked to comment for that newspaper, but she did not want to do this. This case is over, she thought. I don't want to have to think about this anymore. So that was the end of that.
